

Partial dividers and conversation nooks key to open spaces

Landmark Homes' Richmond model offers spacious living quarters

Industry experts agree that the great room is the social center of the house. It should be an open space that allows the family to be together even if they are in separate rooms; whether the kids are in front of the TV and the chef is hard at work, the family can congregate. This trend is demonstrated flawlessly in the latest model, The Richmond, presented by award-winning Landmark Homes.

The expansive great room offers three distinct spaces while keeping an open architectural design. It includes a media room to kick off your shoes and watch TV, as well as a spacious family room perfect for entertaining guests and is finished with a contemporary eat-in kitchen. Dramatic pillars accenting the space separate the areas allowing the entire family to be together, whether the kids are in front of the TV or doing their homework at the kitchen table. During TV time when the kids want a quick nosh, they can grab a snack from the Butler's Pantry which opens to the family room, between the kitchen and dining room. With an open rail to the finished basement and a rear staircase for family use, the great room allows access to the entire house.

"Many of our homeowners like the idea of a big wide open space on the ground floor but we have found that the space becomes more usable if we add definition with out compromising the flow of the rooms," says Landmark Homes President Mike Doren.

Exquisite molding and luxurious built-in cabinets exhibit the attention to detail that goes into each Landmark Home. The formality of the family room nestled between the contemporary kitchen and media room allows the home owner to showcase their personal taste. Built in window seats flanking the custom stone fireplace in the family area make the room warm and inviting for all who enter. Beautiful hard-wood floors and an attractive wet-bar demonstrate the home's sophistication and versatility
